A small business owner, a mover, and a personal assistant walk into a bar...

Quite by accident, a few years ago I stumbled into a job as personal assistant. There I was, minding my own business as the owner (and one of only two employees) of a small but successful moving company. I was working for a high-profile customer in a house big enough to swallow up my own place probably ten times over, and after one thing led to another, she was offering me a job.

I hesitated at first, because I already had a good thing going, but I made time to work with her a few days every week. It was unlike anything else that I'd done, but I liked how each day was different, and how I was able to use the skills I'd developed as a relatively new business owner. I was writing letters for her and organizing documents, managing her staff, making and taking calls on her behalf, and helping to ensure that she was always where she needed to be.

These days, I'm back to being just a mover. I'm good at what I do, and I've got the reviews to prove it, <sup>[1]</sup> but I'm ready to move on to something else. My side gig as a budding personal assistant is suddenly gone, and I've got hours in the day again that are going unused. I'd put you in touch with the woman I was working with, but she's too busy right now traveling the world. She's probably on a sail boat somewhere hard to pronounce, or bumping elbows with the rich and famous. That's fine, though. I learned a lot working for her, and her absence right now is probably the only reason I'm available for something like what you're offering.

I wear many hats, and if you'd like to see what I can bring to the table, please reach out to me. Lets figure out if we can make this work. If not, maybe reach out anyway. I've got a moving company with only two employees, and I hear you're in the business of franchising. Clearly, that's something else that I need.

Looking forward to hearing back,
Joshua Hamilton

1. You can read reviews from U-Haul's Moving Help marketplace over here, and you'll see that my company is the only one in Arizona that's never received anything less than a perfect five-star review. So there's that. ↩
